Creating a last will and testament is a crucial step in securing your family's financial future and ensuring that your wishes are carried out after your passing. However, many individuals fall victim to common mistakes that can result in unintended consequences for their loved ones. In this article, we will explore some of these mistakes and provide advice on how to avoid them. A last will template is a pre-designed document that outlines an individual's final wishes, including how they want their assets distributed, who should care for minor children, and any specific burial requests. While a last will template can provide a good starting point, it's essential to customize it to suit your unique circumstances. One of the primary concerns when creating a last will template is ensuring that it addresses estate taxes. The U.S. federal estate tax exemption is currently $12.92 million per individual, which means that assets below this threshold are generally exempt from taxation. However, states can have their own estate taxes, and some have much lower exemptions. Understanding the specific laws in your state and how they affect your estate is critical. States with a lower exemption threshold: California ($5.64 million), New York ($5.93 million) Over time, life changes, and your beneficiaries may require updates. Failure to do so can lead to unexpected consequences, such as estranged family members inheriting your assets or children who are no longer dependent on you receiving benefits. Make sure to regularly review and update your last will template to reflect any changes in your personal life. Many individuals mistakenly believe that avoiding probate is the primary goal of a last will template. While probate can be a time-consuming and costly process, it's not always a bad thing. In fact, probate can provide an opportunity for the deceased's estate to be reviewed and audited for accuracy. Non-probate distributions, such as trusts or joint accounts, still require proper administration and can be subject to challenges from beneficiaries or creditors. Most people don't realize this, but
