path through the minor leagues required patience and consistent performance. He developed a pitching arsenal centered around a heavy sinker that generates weak contact and ground balls, complemented by a slider that keeps hitters off balance. What separates Dobnak from many organization arms is his ability to pound the strike zone efficiently. He doesn't rely on overpowering velocity. Instead, he challenges hitters to lift a ball that naturally stays low in the zone. For beginners learning to evaluate pitchers, Dobnak offers a useful case study in pitch-to-contact methodology: Sinker emphasis: His primary pitch generates significant downward movement, inducing ground balls at a high rate. Efficiency over strikeouts: He records outs quickly rather than accumulating high pitch counts.
