Start by quantifying every Dora component you integrate. Pull version numbers, count API calls, and note any bundled assets. A simple spreadsheet that logs feature set + runtime frequency = estimated fee tier turns abstract usage into concrete numbers you can present. Next, compare those numbers against Dora's published fee matrix. If the matrix is vague, request a clarification email—most maintainers appreciate the proactive approach and will provide a spreadsheet of their own. This double-check prevents you from overestimating (and overpaying) or underestimating (and facing later penalties). Before you dial the licensing desk, identify at least one comparable library that offers similar functionality under a more favorable license. Prepare a side-by-side feature list and highlight any unique advantages Dora provides that the alternative lacks. When you present this comparison, you signal that you have options, which often nudges the licensor toward a more flexible arrangement. Structure your offer around three pillars: value, duration, and visibility. Explain how your project will showcase
