planning habits with data-driven scheduling, students can unlock more free time, reduce stress, and stay ahead of coursework, extracurriculars, and campus events. The UC Davis academic year is divided into four quarters—Fall, Winter, Spring, and Summer—each spanning roughly ten weeks of instruction plus a week for finals. Unlike semester-based schools, this structure compresses content, making early preparation essential. Understanding key dates—registration windows, add/drop deadlines, and mid-quarter breaks—provides the baseline for any optimization effort. Traditional planning often relies on a simple “list-and-register” method: pick required courses, add a favorite elective, and hope the timetable works out. This can lead to back-to-back labs, overlapping office hours, and missed campus opportunities.
