users, offering flexibility, safety, and a sense of adventure. By translating kinetic animation into concrete forms, planners can craft environments that guide movement, encourage interaction, and celebrate community identity. In the United States, the Butler Township Municipal Building exemplifies this philosophy. Designed by Studio KLP Architects, the structure features a sculptural facade that sweeps across the site like a dragon's curled body, drawing visitors into a dynamic civic hub. Integrated green roofs mimic the dragon's scales, providing insulation and stormwater management. Modular meeting spaces allow the building to reconfigure for community events, echoing the flexible poses of the animated dragon. Transparent glass corridors create visual pathways that guide pedestrians, much like the dragon's sweeping tail directs attention.
