Jackie Chan's 1990s catalog illustrates a deliberate expansion beyond Hong Kong's local market. By partnering with international distributors and casting foreign actors, Chan broke cultural barriers. Supercop introduced him to the American audience, while Rumble in the Bronx"shot on location in New York City"showed his commitment to authenticity. These moves were not mere marketing gimmicks; they reflected a strategic embrace of co-production, allowing Chan to blend Hong Kong's kinetic fight choreography with. Practical Stunts " Chan's refusal to use CGI or doubles kept the physicality of his action scenes raw and visceral. In Police Story 4, he famously fell from a moving car, a moment that became a touchstone for future action directors. Physical Comedy " While delivering high-octane fights, Chan infused his scenes with slapstick timing. The comedic mishaps in Rumble in the Jungle"a broken bridge, a falling statue"provide levity that balances tension. Musical Integration " Each film's soundtrack is woven into the narrative, often featuring martial arts
