divided into three primary semesters—Fall, Spring, and Summer—each anchored by a set of fixed dates: semester start (usually late August for Fall, early January for Spring), mid-term break, and final exam week. In addition, the university publishes a series of supplemental deadlines—add-drop periods, tuition payment windows, and faculty grade submission cut-offs—that are not always highlighted on the main schedule. Recognizing the layers of hard versus soft dates helps researchers avoid.

1. Pre-load courses the night before registration opens. The system refreshes at 12:00 a.m. local time, and early-bird users benefit from a shorter queue. Logging in with two-factor authentication already enabled can shave seconds off the login process.
2. Use the Waitlist Auto-Add feature. When a class reaches capacity, the auto-add option automatically enrolls you if a spot opens before the add-drop deadline. This is especially useful for high-demand labs that often fluctuate during the first week.
