Both papers publish daily crosswords, yet their design philosophies diverge. The Seattle Times tends toward thematic clues that lean on regional culture and contemporary slang, while the NYT emphasizes layered wordplay and a progressive difficulty curve. Recognizing these nuances prevents you from applying a one-size-fits-all method and saves precious minutes on trial-and-error. Start with a fixed time slot. Allocate 15 minutes in the morning and another 10 minutes after lunch. Consistency trains your brain to anticipate the puzzle's rhythm, reducing the cognitive load of "getting into the zone."

- Use a two-pass system. On the first pass, fill every answer you know without consulting the grid for cross-checks. On the second pass, focus exclusively on blanks that intersect with confirmed letters. This prevents premature backtracking and speeds up completion.
