Beyond the headline start and end dates for Fall, Spring, and Summer terms, the calendar contains three lesser-known markers that shape workload peaks: Mid-term Reading Days. Typically a single Monday or Tuesday two weeks before finals, these days are officially free of classes but often earmarked for faculty-set reading assignments. Planning a focused review session on a reading day can shave hours off late-night cramming. Dead Week adjustments. While most campuses label the week before finals as a study lull, Cornell inserts a mandatory no-class-on-Friday policy that frees up an entire day for group projects or tutoring gigs. Early registration windows. The Early Registration period opens 30 days before classes start and closes 10 days later. Securing a spot in high-demand electives during this window can prevent schedule clashes
