days, break periods, and professional development blocks determines the rhythm of classroom learning. A calendar that clusters too many non-instructional days can fragment unit pacing, while a well-spaced schedule sustains momentum, allowing concepts to mature before testing. In New Braunfels ISD, the calendar intentionally distributes long weekends and winter breaks to avoid mid-unit interruptions, a practice shown to improve retention rates compared with districts that concentrate. Legacy calendars often follow a "quarter" pattern—four nine-week segments punctuated by a single extended holiday. New Braunfels departs from this by employing a "flex semester" approach, breaking the year into two halves with interleaved "in-service" weeks. This contrast yields measurable differences:
